

ABSTRACT

A mechanism is disclosed for controlling capacity in a communication system, based on zones in which subscribers are located. When a subscriber seeks to establish a communication session among multiple subscribers, a determination is made as to whether more than a threshold
5 number of the subscribers are located in a common zone. If so, the excess subscribers in that zone are excluded from participating in the session.